

Wisconsin has finally passed a law that benefits the people, that the people are overwhelmingly in favor of. Don't you dare try to subvert that. If bankers can't "do business" without calling people at all hours of the night, day, weekend, then they need to find another line of work. This federal administration touts "states rights" when they don't want to fund a social program, then cites the need for a "uniform federal standard" when a state enacts a policy that runs counter to corporate special interests. We don't like telemarketers!
